Something that I often wish for when using Photoshop CS6 is being able to edit a group of similar files without having to create a unique file for every one of them. I would usually copy the image path, its required settings, and change the name to the new set. However, when creating a new file with these changes, usually there would be an extra section of information that would automatically be added to the end of the file name. I would try to add this back to my final file, and some of my adjustments would get mixed in with everything else. In addition, the Export setting would have all the settings for saving a file that was cut and paste copied to be mapped. This is usually the Save as type of setting. This would be a bit annoying when this was happening, and I would have to take times to copy every one of the settings and paste it back into the individual files. The interface is a lot like what you'd see if you were an experienced iOS developer, with a four tab, horizontal bar structure for icons, app navigation, and the use of a tabbed interface to access more core features, functions, and utilities. The tabbed interface allows for the addition of any number of additional tabs, if need be, giving a more complete feature library. And if you're an experienced iOS developer, Adobe's materials are very true to the iOS visual DNA, with the same interface consistency and style. There's even a very satisfying Apple-like "Pull to Refresh" feature present on every page. You're not stuck with the "+" or "-" for features and functions. You can add or remove as many features and functions as you see fit.

Actions are defined in Photoshop as collections of predefined steps that perform a specific task. These support automation, and most are written in JavaScript. You can define actions for common tasks, such as "change the look of a specific site" or "add a special effect to a photograph." Adobe has also created Actions Extensions (Adobe® Photoshop® Actions) which allow you to define actions within your Photoshop actions panel. In that way, they extend the Actions panel. The Actions panel allows you to sequence a web of actions, which act on the layers or other elements of a single image in a multi-layer composition. The Actions panel uses an expandable, treeview, to help you see which actions can be performed on what layers. Actions can call up actions in other panels, allowing you to build complex, hierarchically nested groupings of Actions. Lightroom supports JPEG and TIFF but also all other RAW image formats.
